KANSAS CITY FED TECH STAFF TO INCREASE BY UP TO 200; NETWORKING EVENT TO FEATURE GROWING PORTFOLIO

To support the work of the nation's central bank, the Federal Reserve Bank of Kansas City expects to hire up to 200 technology professionals over the next three years. These positions, which will require employees with a wide range of information technology experience and skills, are needed to assist the Federal Reserve in meeting the goals of its three mission areas: conducting monetary policy, providing financial services to depository institutions and the U.S. Treasury, and supervising financial institutions.

“The Kansas City Fed has a long-standing culture of promoting innovation and excellence,” said Brian Faros, the Bank's chief information officer. “With more than 400 technology professionals currently on staff, we're excited about this opportunity to further expand our responsibilities for providing technology support and innovative solutions for the central bank.”

To introduce Kansas City-area technology professionals to this growing portfolio and tradition of innovation, the Kansas City Fed will host a networking event on January 29 from 5 p.m. to 7:30 p.m. at 1 Memorial Drive, Kansas City, MO 64198.

The open-house event will feature an inside look into the broad range of technology opportunities and practices available at the Kansas City Fed, including solution and data architecture, software engineering, help desk support, user experience and business analysis. Attendees will also learn more about the Kansas City Fed's work in the areas of big data, project management and other specialties.
